In Praise of Small Miseries

Sheri Reda
sheri.a.reda@gmail.com ORCID: 0009-0008-9751-3860

Poetry/ Received: 18.11.2022 / Accepted: 21.06.2023
This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License.
In Praise of Small Miseries
by Sheri Reda

About the Author

Sheri Reda is a writer, educator, and performer who serves as Executive Director of Flow and Moment, LLC, and as a librarian with Wilmette Public Library. Her most recent publications include stories published in the anthologies Storytellers True Stories About Love, Storytellers Stage to Page, and The Healers Burden. Her poetry chapbook entitled “Stubborn” was published by Lulu Publishing as a Locofo Chap. In addition to certifications in celebrancy, spiritual direction and mediation, Sheri holds an M.A. in Modern Letters, an M.A. in Religions, and an MLIS. She is a member of the Chicago Conservation Corps.
In Praise of Small Miseries

Sheri Reda

On lowland plains in Sierra Leone, the tsetse and its taste for marauders' cattle once and again protected the clans from Mandinka invaders and Malian imperialists.

At South Central, in West Virginia, an inmate night after day after night sliced his palms to fashion an escape with dental floss a three-inch hacksaw and a small battery to kill the electric fence and would have been a hero to all of us in captivity if not for the other bigger things he'd done.

In Abruzzo, a monumental Pontone Beech continues to weather wood-boring, bark, and long-horned beetles weevils, aphids, geometrid moths beech bark disease water mold and tinder fungi mildew ozone molecules and the felling of its young and stands there for centuries growing as it falls apart:

A small but mighty thing, to live on.